Thought this story from the BBC News site of June 18th might interest you (the Drudge Report had a link to it) An outfit called American Cell Technology has acknowledged that they have succeeded in cloning a human cell, kept it alive, then destroyed it before it was 14 days old. Interesting remark the BBC made in its article: " ...but this development will also [cause] a significant heightening of the debate over the ethics of human cloning, and indeed what it means to be a human." Are we on the cutting edge, or what?!
