Those of you who have access to The New York Review of Science Fiction should by all means check out the new issue. Michael Andre-Driussi (our mantis) has the cover story, a perfectly fascinating essay on how, by use of language, Jack Vance, Gene Wolfe and Damien Broderick (also ours; hi Damien) evoke the fin du monde as the sun gutters out. It's well-researched, is terrific on parallel and influence, and, as we could only expect, lively as hell.

no mention of C J Cherryh's "Sunfall"?
