And Crowley's "Daemonomania". Words fail me. Is there any discussion of Crowley's work on the web? On a second reading, I've just started to realise how much of the historical part which I had assumed was fantasy is based on John Dee's actual life and works; and how much the realistic present day sections are mutating into fantasy as Crowley's world changes. I can't wait for the final novel in the sequence. Does anyone have any idea how long it is likely to be before he finishes it?

At last, a perfect opportunity!

The answer to your question is yes and no. There is a Crowley discussion group* on line, but there hasn't been much discussion for quite a while. This is at least partly because there are only seven members in the group right now, which seems to be below the critical mass.

This group is in the form of a Yahoo! Club. You can receive messages by email but you have to visit the web site to post messages. However, the emails contain links to take you directly to the proper web page. You can see the archive of the messages so far at the link below:

<http://clubs.yahoo.com/clubs/johncrowleyreaders>

If you want to join you will have to send an email to Teresa Toro, the club founder, asking her to invite you.

And now my apologies to the list. I know some of you have already received invitations to join this "club;" I am sorry if my bringing it up again is inconvenient or annoying. I am posting this message to the list because I know there are many who did not receive an invitation, especially lurkers. I apologize for cross-posting this message, but I want to make sure that I reach people who may only be subscribed to the Urth list and are interested in signing up.

I think this has the potential to lead to a good discussion group, despite the off-putting fact that is it called a club and the off-putting commercial connotations of it being associated with Yahoo!, but it seems certain that it will only work if there are more members.

*There, of course, may be much Crowley discussion on the Internet elsewhere that I am not aware of.
