Someone claimed the gravity on Blue and Green was similar. This is a pretty uninstantiated claim. The narrator can walk up a cliff with one hand and fight off inhumu with the other. There is also a scene in In Green's Jungles where the narrator talks about jumping over a huge fence. Gravity on Blue and Urth is the same. The distance of the moon has changed from present times by the time of Shadow of the Torturer, being moved in, as an early chapter in that text will reveal. Hoof says that "GREEN" was much closer than from Blue.

Green is no bigger than Lune. I'm not going to say anymore. They are the same. All of your calculations will amount to little. I don't think Wolfe did the calculations before he started writing. Other ideas interest him. We can use science such as, say, our understanding of hybrids and clones to appreciate his work; holding him to a mathematically rigorous stance for interpretation seems somewhat too complicated for a creative artist, don't you think?
