Roy says

The textual fact of the matter is that Typhon's children were exactly that -- little children -- at the time they were scanned for the _Whorl_. Cilinia (Scylla), Echidna's firstborn, was close to the age of puberty: Her siblings were all younger; the youngest could not have been much more than six years old when scanned. The idea that seven little kids took part in any meaningful way in a conspiracy against their father is laughable on the face of it.

Well, 12 year old Cilinia did connive against her father with one of his deadly enemies. Proto-Echidna was no child. I would not have any trouble imagining all sorts of treachery from Typhon's children regardless of how small.... however, your next point is rather more...eh....pointy.

As for the notion that Piaton was/is Typhon's son . . . my blood pressure is much too high as it is. A moment's reflection on the above textual facts should suffice to show that it couldn't have happened as Crush theorized.

You doctor wants me to tell you to take a pill, Roy. ;-)

But your point is well taken. I find this point more frustrating than you can possibly imagine even with your chronically high blood pressure [no surprise there, I'm afraid. ;-)]. I concede. There is no good reason to suppose Piaton=Hieros.
