Why does this scene keep popping up in the story?

Maybe he's a Buddha-like figure? The "Almost" in his name indicating he has yet to achieve enlightenment?

Would an enlightened person be just?

Just enlightened.

I think he might get close.

But to be just, I just don't see it.

Just enlightened.

In Scholastic thought, the virtues as we know them, including justice, are not real things in themselves, but human participation in eternal virtues (the names of those escape me.)

Humans in Heaven will attain these eternal virtues, but will find that even they are only the lesser shadows of divine virtues.

So ever someone who is "just" on Earth is not "just" in the same sense as someone who is "just" in Heaven, and even that person would not be "just" in the sense that God is just.
