I preferred Wolfe's explanation of how the Alzabo was a metaphor for his former mega-corp employer, Procter and Gamble. For me that's where the true human understanding of the meaning of the text is found)

Dan'l- Oh, aye. We're in agreement there; I was just tweaking this whole silly argument about whether there are domes on Lune or what. What really matters is that Lune stands green in the sky as a symbol of man's past engineering glory, to which Vodalus foolishly thinks he can restore the world. It is a doubled symbol of decadance: the technological decadance that has fallen so far from the ability to do such things; and the moral decadance that said "just because we can, we should.".....(Well, maybe the alzabo isn't completely ridiculous: if it isn't a native animal of some far world, but bioengineered by humans to produce the analeptic...)

OMG now, I'm starting to worry about the real effect on my mind of...

PRINGLES!!!!!!!!!!!! ; -)

"You can't eat just one," as the alzabo said to the Vodalarius.
