I may have overstepped in saying that Scelorderma's account had made into The Book of the Long Sun and saying that parts of the book were from the pens of others. "What I more precisely meant to convey was the fact that many parts of the book as written by Horn and Nettle were accounts of events they did not personally witness, such as the scene with Hare and the eagle that was relayed at some remove by the kite maker. ?I had thought there were portions that had to be cribbed from Scleroderma's account as well but I have not been able to confirm that having taken the time to look at it. ?Maybe someone else can" recall better than I. ?Then of course, there is the added problem of determining whether we are reading Horn and Nettle's The Book of the Long Sun or that guy from Urbasecundus's. ?(See On Blue's Waters, pg. 51).

Whoa, slow down. Scleroderma always confused me, just another person (or thing) I didn't understand why they were given so much attention. If Scleroderma was just a friend of Horn or Nettle, that makes some sense to me. At one point in Short Sun, Horn says that Book of the Long Sun is about a thousand pages long. At a another point they say that Scleroderma wrote her own book. So, the Afterword was ridden by Hoof and Hide and their wives. So, does this mean, that Book of the Long Sun is a compilation of Horn and Nettle's, and Scleroderma's books?

Damn it, I need to reread all of Wolfe. Well, what I've read so far. No more internet for me.
