Recently my esteemed colleague from across the Isles Tony Ellis wrote:

<"those little French girls... weren't they the cutest things? ..one of <those Frenchies would come in, just in rags you know, but with a ribbon <and a flower in her hair, and every boy's head would turn."

<Now doesn't that sound like the famed Annese ability for mimicry?

Another notion is that Mrs. Blount--who's reminiscing about this poutingly, whining about how she'd come to the dance much more elegantly dressed and no boys would look her--is that there is a measure of discrimination being leveled against her, because she's the daughter of penal colonists.

Of course she could have just been plain shovelface ugly too.

I went where Liev went, sinisterly.
