I have been so busy and unable to finish the book, but today I managed to finish it during lunch. I hardly ever claim to think something my favorite, but after reading this book, this series is the best I have ever read and this book the best cap.

It is wonderful!

Other quotes I like - I like the end section where Hoof tries to explain that he is so good that he is terrifying. wow. That is amazing.

I love the appendix, where it finally made sense to me how the 3rd person sections of the book were written.

I love all the nice parallels - divine/mortal - trying to be something - inhuman and humans - gods and humans - gods and birds - birds and humans. Some of this talk goes on in Hoof's section where he tries to explain the fear.

I guess the inhuman and blood - kind of obvious, maybe too much so to say, but it is neat how it parallels communion and how someone might be taking communion to become more like something they wish to be.

I was confused too about how he said he wouldn't call Seawrack until Nettle was dead - I have to go back - Maybe what some of you are saying is true - maybe he finally admitted to himself that he "killed" Horn - and though, Nettle is not dead, Horn is, so he calls Seawrack. But I am still confused about that and must think on it some more.

I am still catching up with all the digests. Did anyone ever answer the question about where there may be a poem that uses the "silent shout" imagery? I am still curious about that.
