A few months ago, I urged Ellen Datlow to run a Gene Wolfe story on SCI FICTION, and lo--whether because of my suggestion or without reference to it--she has now done so. The story is new, it's called "Copperhead", and it can be found here:

Actually, if you access the site at a somewhat earlier point--

<http://www.scifi.com/scifiction/originals/>

--you'll be able to access the charming autobiographical sketch Wolfe wrote to accompany the story. It's found in the lower right hand corner at the hypertext link "by Gene Wolfe".

Hey, Nick, do you know any other on-line editors who might be able to run pieces by the man?

Wow, I hated this story. It had all my least favorite Lupine elements: phonetic dialect, misogyny, Christianity, and an incomprehensible ending.

Did anyone like it?

I liked it. Didn't understand the last paragraph but everything else seemed fairly straight forward. At least I could figure out the phonetic dialect this time. Many times I didn't know what Pig was saying.
