vizcacha:

more out of mischievousness than anything else,

His neck is unnaturally long and wrinkled,

You might expect some stretching and pulling when a human body is used as a piece of apparel his profile is nearly noseless, and some wear and tear over the years...

his head

sways from side to side,

sure, there is a snake inside...

he is light but strong, and so on.

because his form belies his innards...

There is also a description of him touching up his makeup (on the first page of _Calde_): "He had shaped and colored his face and neck with care upon arising..." Later, "he extracted the puff ... and applied flesh-toned powder delicately to the small, sharp chin he had shaped with such care upon arising."

Is it really feasible that, with deft application of putty and foundation that a scarlet-plumed serpent could masquerade as a human? <g>
