Tercel,

Great work on the fliers! (I can't tell you how much searching I did . . . how close I got . . .)
Thanks!

But wait--there's more! How about "canna" (the least damaging name for the propulsion module) and "gleacaiocht" (the unarmed combat)?

Thanks in advance!

Dave,

And when Silk is dead wrong, it is easily verified by the text and the context. For example: Chenille says she doesn't want to go near any Sacred Windows because she's been possessed through them at the Sun Street manteion and at the Lake Shrine; Silk comes close to telling her that there isn't a Sacred Window at the Lake Shrine (IV, ch. 2, p. 47). We readers know that Silk looked for one, couldn't find it before he was dragged down by the vengeful talos; Chenille found it hidden under a plaque and was quickly ridden by Scylla; neither one has compared notes with the other.

Then there is Silk ignoring Oreb's warnings about Quetzal, but that isn't wrong so much as it is willfully ignorant.

He figures out Chenille's parentage by the end of III and always seems very close to figuring out who Blood's father is.

Any other big instances of Silk being wrong? (There must be--I'm not trying to come up with an exhaustive list, just trying to find out what you are thinking of.)

OK, I'll bite: who is it?
